Cheat Sheet Template Guide

- Make sure to use an 8-point font as much as possible. This will help you with including as much information as possible in a sheet of paper. You can leave out some space for handwritten diagrams or tables you are looking to include later after taking notes on definitions and so on.
- If you can master one aspect of the subject, then do it, especially if the notes or formulas involving it takes too much of space, which won't help you make a very neat cheat sheet that is at the same time not hard on the eyes in terms of reading. Try to master that big chunk of formula or table, for example, to save some space for other notes.
- Do a quick list of notes that you can skim through very quickly if your teacher does not allow you to take the cheat sheet in the exam. This is one practical way of passing your exam. You can make a bulleted list of important terms or points that you can skim through very fast before the exam begins.

- Try to limit your guide sheet to one page. In the process, you will be able to have more time in memorizing if you need to. This is much better than having to memorize three pages of text. Remember, if you're short of time, you should learn how to create a concise one-page cheat sheet.
- You can also make use of pictures in your sheet. These images can be reminders or clues about certain things you want to recall that you have put into representation as images.
- You can also include color codes, which are going to help you with the classification and organization of your data. In the process, you will be able to locate any of those you are looking to find in an instant.
- Read and reread your cheat sheet to ensure accuracy of data you included.
